Spring Docs explain that . In proxy mode (which is the default), only external method calls coming in through the proxy are intercepted. This means that self-invocation, in effect, a method within the target object calling another method of the target object, will not lead to an actual transaction at runtime even if the invoked method is marked with @Transactional.

The Tableau documentation calls this feature "creating calculations in dialog boxes", but what you're really doing is using AutoComplete to create formula-based filters to focus the data displayed in a visualization. You'll use the Filters dialog box's Conditional tab to create it. In this movie, I'll show you how to create these filters.

Foreign Key Constraint Names Have to be Unique Within a Database. Both @Dorvalla's answer and this blog post mentioned above pointed me into the right direction to fix the problem for myself; quoting from the latter:. If the table you're trying to create includes a foreign key constraint, and you've provided your own name for that constraint, remember that it must be unique within the database.
